Do you need a brooder box for chicks?

Brooder boxes are for newly hatched chicks. They are set up with bedding, food, water, and heat to keep them warm. If you incubate your eggs or buy chicks from a breeder, you will need a brooder to raise your chicks. But this isn't a forever home. Most chicks can go outside by four weeks old as long as it's above 70 degrees outside at night.

What is a brooder box?

A brooder box is a heated enclosure for your new baby chicks that are not being raised by a mama hen. Your brooder will be taking the place of the mother hen. A brooder should provide a warm, safe place for your chicks the first few weeks of their life. What do you put in a brooder box?

What should a chick brooder box contain?

A chick brooder box should contain all the essential supplies necessary for your chicks to thrive. This would include a heat source, bedding, thermometer, perch, electrolytes, proper food and water containers as well as food and water. See important details for each supply in the following list. 1. Enclosure

How do I make a chick brooder box?

A large dog crate makes a great little DIY chick brooder box. It's already enclosed, has an access door, and usually comes with a solid bottom too. If the gaps are large enough for chicks to slip through, you may need to line the sides with chicken wire or cardboard.

How big should a brooder box be?

A brooder box should give enough room for about 1/2 square foot per chick from 1-4 weeks old. When they get a little bigger, 4-8 weeks, you should increase the space to 1 square foot per chick. So a brooder box that is 4 feet long x 1 1/2 feet wide is big enough to raise 24 chicks from 1-4 weeks old.

How do you keep baby chicks safe in a brooder box?

Keep a lid on it! No matter what type of brooder box container you use, a secure breathable lid is essential to keep the chicks IN and keep unwanted visitors out, like other pets. By just a few weeks old, baby chicks will be able to jump up and out of a brooder! Mesh fencing like chicken wire or hardware cloth is a great option.
